- Experiential education engages students because it is active learning. Students learn better and retain what they have learned longer when they do something with the material beyond sitting and listening. Students learn to reflect on their own performances and progress, identifying their strengths and challenges. As they learn the basics of a particular skill, they also develop habits and values of professionalism that will deepen their commitment to excellence and professional growth throughout their careers.

- This essay proposes that effective implementation of experiential education must begin with training law students on how to learn from experience during the first year of law school. It offers a prescription for incorporating reflective learning into the first year as a means of readying students for the extensive legal training--including clinics, externships, and simulation coursework--that lies ahead.

- This article suggests that the key to teaching professional identity is creating situations where students will be confronted with, and pushed to reflect on, questions of professional identity. The best questions are those that go beyond a particular ethical rule, or a particular behavior associated with professionalism. The best questions for teaching address the complex interplay of our various roles and duties as lawyers.

- Clinical experiences provide valuable opportunities for law students to reflect on their individual professional character, their skills, interests, strengths and weaknesses, and values as practitioners. Quite possibly, the student's opportunity for personal reflection and growth as a professional in clinical experience is unparalleled in law school. The importance of this kind of learning is recognized by clinicians in their scholarship and by our students in their formal and informal evaluations of their clinical experiences.

- This article is intended for legal educators who wish to develop the multi-faceted reflective capacity of their students. A significant barrier is failing to adequately operationalize the term “reflective practice” to build a common language, appreciation and respect for its power to support professional learning – both instrumental and transformative.
- Poorly introduced “reflective practice pedagogy” may have adverse consequences, preventing the student from appreciating the generative impact reflective practice has on professional learning and nurturing the capacity for lifelong learning. To overcome this danger, this article also explores 10 perils legal educators may wish to avoid when introducing reflective practice.
